

The Story of the Fight by Rounds, as Told by the Camera

1—During the first round. Here we see Jack and Georges feinting for an opening. This was after Carpentier had landed his first stinging right to the champion's jaw, and as Jack advances this time the photograph shows that he has thrown his left shoulder well up, as guard against the right hand that almost robbed him of his world's championship in the next round. The picture gives an excellent idea of how the two fighters compared physically—Dempsey decidedly the more rugged figure.

2—In the first round. The men are in a clinch, with Carpentier holding and Dempsey roughing him around and punishing Georges with jarring short-arm blows. These punches sapped Carpentier's strength in the opening round. Dempsey's greater bulk enabled him to handle the slender challenger almost as he pleased. In almost every clinch Dempsey, holding with one arm, hit with his free hand, inflicting severe punishment.

3—In the second round. Another illustration of the manner in which Dempsey punished Carpentier in close quarters. Standing chest to chest, Dempsey is ripping home uppercuts and cuffing Georges about the head with short right and left hooks. When Carpentier sought to protect his face from these blows Dempsey shifted his attack to the body, shooting in terrific punches.

4—Start of the third round. Dempsey is advancing on Carpentier, who is backing away slowly, left hand extended. Dempsey has his left shoulder well up, as a guard against Georges' dangerous right hand. Had Carpentier been satisfied to stay away from his heavier opponent for five or six rounds until the champion had lost some of his speed, it is possible the fight would have lasted longer. But Georges traded blows with Dempsey and took fearful punishment.

5—Round three. Carpentier falls through the ropes. Here we see Georges partly suspended across the second strand of the ring. This was not the result of a blow by Dempsey, but a shove given as the men were sliding along the ropes, the champion following the challenger relentlessly. In trying to edge by his foe, Carpentier partly slipped and Jack happened to push the Frenchman half out of the ring.

6—The first knockdown. Here Carpentier is stretched near the center of the ring, after receiving a terrific right blow under the heart, followed by a cruel left hook squarely to the side of the jaw.

7—The finish in the fourth round. Referee Ertle is counting out Carpentier. Dempsey is standing with his back against the ropes, ready to resume the battle should Carpentier regain his feet.
